Barbara and Stillman Rogers are native New Englanders, who write frequently about their home states. They write regular travel columns and restaurant reviews, and their work has appeared in Yankee, Yankee Travel Guide to New England, and the Boston Herald.

Each time we drive the two hours to Vermont for a day visit, a weekend or longer, this guide rides with us. I think that Barbara and Roger Stillman won me over with the six "zones" they created to divide the state into regions for a vacationer. Other attempts at dividing the state have not been done as usefully or simply. We recently centered a six day visit in Rutland, part of the what the Stillman's call the "Middle West Vermont" zone. From there we found a trip to Fort Ticonderoga in New York, a visit to Burlington and golf outings in Killington all to be about an hour or less from our "headquarters" in Rutland. It's this kind of planning that makes vacationing fun. We had primary plans and secondary plans ready if the weather turned on us. Luckily we only endured one day of rain and that was perfect for our "shopping" day at selected book shops and antique shops. This guide lets you plan for that. On another trip our visit further north took us to the infamous Smuggler's Notch, where we tested our driving skill, and the limits of our automobile during the fringe season, prior to the road being closed for the season. The regular travel guides won't be helpful in getting ready for that kind of adventure. The guide is good for bed and breakfasts, but you should know that there are many other accommodations available other than those listed here. But, that's not the focus of this guide. This guide is to get you away from the standard and traditional and onto the off-beat and off-track. Try it, you'll like it.
